

Juan was a CEU PhD student who recently submitted a couple of articles in two different journals. He wanted to make his articles open access if possible.

So he visited the CEU Library website to get more information.

He also learned about the requirements he needed to meet in order to publish open access.

First, he needs to be a "corresponding author" of the accepted article. Next, he needs to be affiliated with CEU at the time his article is accepted. But sometimes (for certain publishers) it's based on submission date instead.

Also, the article needs to list "Central European University" as his affiliation or one of his affiliations.

And he needs to use his CEU e-mail address when submitting the article. Juan affirmed that he could meet all these requirements.

He noticed that one of his publishers was listed on the page, so he read the details about their specific guidelines.

He could not find the publisher for his other article, so he clicked on CEU Open Access Fund to learn more. But he noticed that the fund is for Resident Faculty only.

He also noticed that the fund is available for books and book chapters (in addition to articles), so he decided to tell his supervisor who was working on a book chapter at the moment.

After that he decided to send an email to OAFunding@ceu.edu to ask some questions about particular publishers, and get advice about which Creative Commons license he might use.

He got answers to all of his questions and he was happy that his research would be available to anyone, anywhere.
